AutoCAD is used in a wide range of fields, including architecture, engineering, automotive design, construction, manufacturing, medical, mining, and other industries. The first version of AutoCAD had a small operating system, called Windows FORTRAN, that was tailored for AutoCAD on the IBM PC platform. Some features, such as XREF support and collision detection, were not present in the early versions, while other features, such as the ability to do non-destructive editing, were only available in the 2003 version. I don't know what happened, but I accidentally removed the "unpublished" property from a Google Drive document. Is there a way to restore it? A: No. The only way to restore access to a Drive document is to publish it. I'm not sure why this wasn't clear in the first place. A Google support engineer should have explained this and not made it seem like you could just delete unpublished documents. Q: How to create a periodic event based on a database query? I'm working on a project where every time someone buys something I'll add a record to the database. In the data model, every item purchased is stored as a row in a table. I'd like to see how to determine the next time this event would occur, since it's not necessarily a time-based event. For example, every time someone buys something they have a range of days in which they have the item. How would I go about adding a rule where every time someone buys an item I'd be notified via email every time that item was bought? This is a very basic example of what I'm after, but I'm interested to see how it would be done: if the_date = today then table.insert {item_id, item_name} into my_table table.insert {item_id, item_name} into my_table elseif the_date = 1 day from today then table.insert {item_id, item_name} into my_table table. ca3bfb1094
